Easy Readers:

Easy readers are intended for children reading at a first or second grade level. Their standard format has a large font, short sentences, limited text per page, and at least one illustration on each double-page spread. The vocabulary may be controlled, and is generally limited to sight words, words of few syllables, and a familiar spoken vocabulary. Easy readers are often written as part of a series.

The following titles are available from the Curriculum Materials Center of the Cheng Library. Usually only one book by an author is listed. Since authors often write other books on the same reading level (and with the same characters), look for other titles by that author.

If the book belongs to a series, the series title is indicated in parentheses, e.g. (I Can Read). You may use the online catalog to find other books in that series.

Starting in 2006 the American Library Association began distributing the Theodor Seuss Geisel Award for “the most distinguished American book for beginning readers.” Geisel Award winners and Honor books are designated (Geisel, year).

This list is divided into Levels A, B, C (Barstow, 2008):

Level A books usually have sentences with three to five single-syllable, easily recognizable words and the text is often in large print; illustrations usually take up two-thirds of each page.

Level B books have a balance between text and illustrations, more complex sentences, and more descriptors, phrases, and multi-syllabic words.

In Level C books, illustrative material is frequently reduced to alternating pages, there is more text, sentences are frequently compound, and vocabulary is more difficult.

Jill Bennett (1991) identifies the stages of early literacy, as First Steps (beginning stage), the Gaining Confidence (early-reading stage) and Taking Off (getting ready for bigger challenges).
